Monika Gravagno, Educational Developer, CSM

Identifying problem

Step 1: Identifying problem/research question

- In January 2025 JTM Programme meeting, staff reflected on how the UAL Climate, Social, and Racial Justice Principles were being embedded into courses.
- Principle 4 – Design for human equity, social and racial justice – was identified as the least embedded in the curriculum.

Case study: Design for human equity, social, racial justice in JTM

Step 2: Gather data

P4: Design for human equity, social, and racial justice in JTM - Case Study

Written by Hannah Ogahara – Climate Advocate, Jewellery Textiles & Materials (JTM) programme, Central Saint Martins

Co-edited by Monika Gravagno – Climate Justice Curriculum Developer, CSM

Background

1. Setting the Stage: Place, People & Purpose

Central Saint Martins's Jewellery, Textiles & Materials (JTM) community, is an eclectic mix of BA and MA students working, investigating materials in the broadest sense ranging from open-ended design speculation to hands-on craftsmanship.

Courses: BA (Hons) Jewellery Design, BA (Hons) Textile Design, MA Material Futures, MA Biodesign, and MA Regenerative Design (online).

On the JTM website, it states that, "Alongside our ethos of radical materiality and intricate making, we are committed to decolonising our curriculum, diversifying our shared learning resources, prioritising representation and developing planet-positive design strategies. We evoke curiosity and provoke change. We actively empower our students and staff to share our strong sense of accountability for climate and biodiversity emergency, economy and social justice."

I joined this setting in two capacities: first as an MA Regenerative Design graduate with a background in education and now as Climate Advocate for the JTM programme. The Climate Advocate scheme – an initiative of UAL's Academic Discourse & Action Learning (ADAL) Working Group – places recent alumni inside courses to audit handbooks, co-design curriculum and act as "critical friends" on climate, racial and social-justice questions.

2. Institutional Drivers: From Guiding Principles to Practice

Since 2023 the ADAL Working Group has been steering Central Saint Martins toward its 2026 Education for Sustainable Development goals. Concrete outputs already in circulation include:

- Five Guiding Principles for Climate, Racial & Social Justice (Fig. 1)

- Research question: How students experienced teaching related to human equity, social and racial justice
- Who: 10 class reps from Jewellery, Materials and Textile Programme at CSM.
- With: Hannah Ogahara (Climate Advocate) and Rose Thompson (Evidence and Evaluation Manager)
- Method: Peer-to-peer semi-structured interviews.
- Analysis: The data were thematically analysed and presented as a case study

Findings

Step 3: Interpret Data

- Social and racial justice themes are only marginally present in curriculum.
- Strong desire for opportunities to explore those themes in authentic, participatory and discursive way.
- Students felt staff didn't feel confident to have conversation about equity, racial and social justice with students.

ARP focus

Step 4: Implement changes

- Develop a staff training workshop designed to build equity literacy.
- Through object-based learning activities.
- Centred on belonging and identity.
- Providing a reflective, participatory space to explore how educators can foster more authentic and meaningful engagement with students around equity and justice.
- Introduce the object-based learning framework and pedagogy and how to apply to their own teaching

Workshop set up

Own Your Impact, Not Only Your Intent

We acknowledge that harm can occur even when harm was not intended.

If someone names harm:

- We listen
- We reflect
- We repair where possible
- We stay engaged without defensiveness
- We stay accountable without shame.

Practice Curiosity, Humility, and Cultural Generosity

We understand that identities and stories are shaped by histories, migrations, cultures, languages, and power.

We approach each object and story with curiosity — never voyeurism or assumptions.

We ask questions that honour, not extract.

Honour Absence, Silence, and Choice

We respect silence as a valid way of participating, and we do not pressure anyone to reveal more than they choose.

We Build This Space Together

This workshop is co-created.

We share responsibility for maintaining a relational, ethical, and brave environment. If we witness harm, exclusion, or micro/macroaggressions, we intervene with care and courage.

How much space do I take and why?

Evaluating Object-Based Learning Workshop on Belonging and Identity.

Purpose:
This questionnaire invites you to reflect on your experience of the Object-Based Learning Workshop on Belonging and Identity. Your anonymous feedback will be used to evaluate the workshop and support the ongoing development of inclusive and equity-focused teaching practices across CSM, including the refinement of future staff development provision.

Thematic analysis

Step 6: Reflect on evaluation/changes

- 9 participants responded
- Conducted a thematic analysis

Quantitative data analysis

The workshop created a supportive and respectful space to explore identity, belonging, and equity-related themes

How relevant was the workshop to your teaching practice and learning context?

After this session, I feel more confident using participatory or object-based approaches to explore identity and belonging in my teaching

Overall

- “...nice framework to investigate our own assumptions and prejudice,”
- “Facilitating safe space to reflect ‘On Belonging’ from a deeply personal point of view/lived experience offered authentic, impactful insight.”
- “It encouraged thinking through learning about personal standpoint.”
- “A safe space for collaboration and collective learning”.

**Quotes from participants’ response questionnaire*

The structure, and pedagogical framework

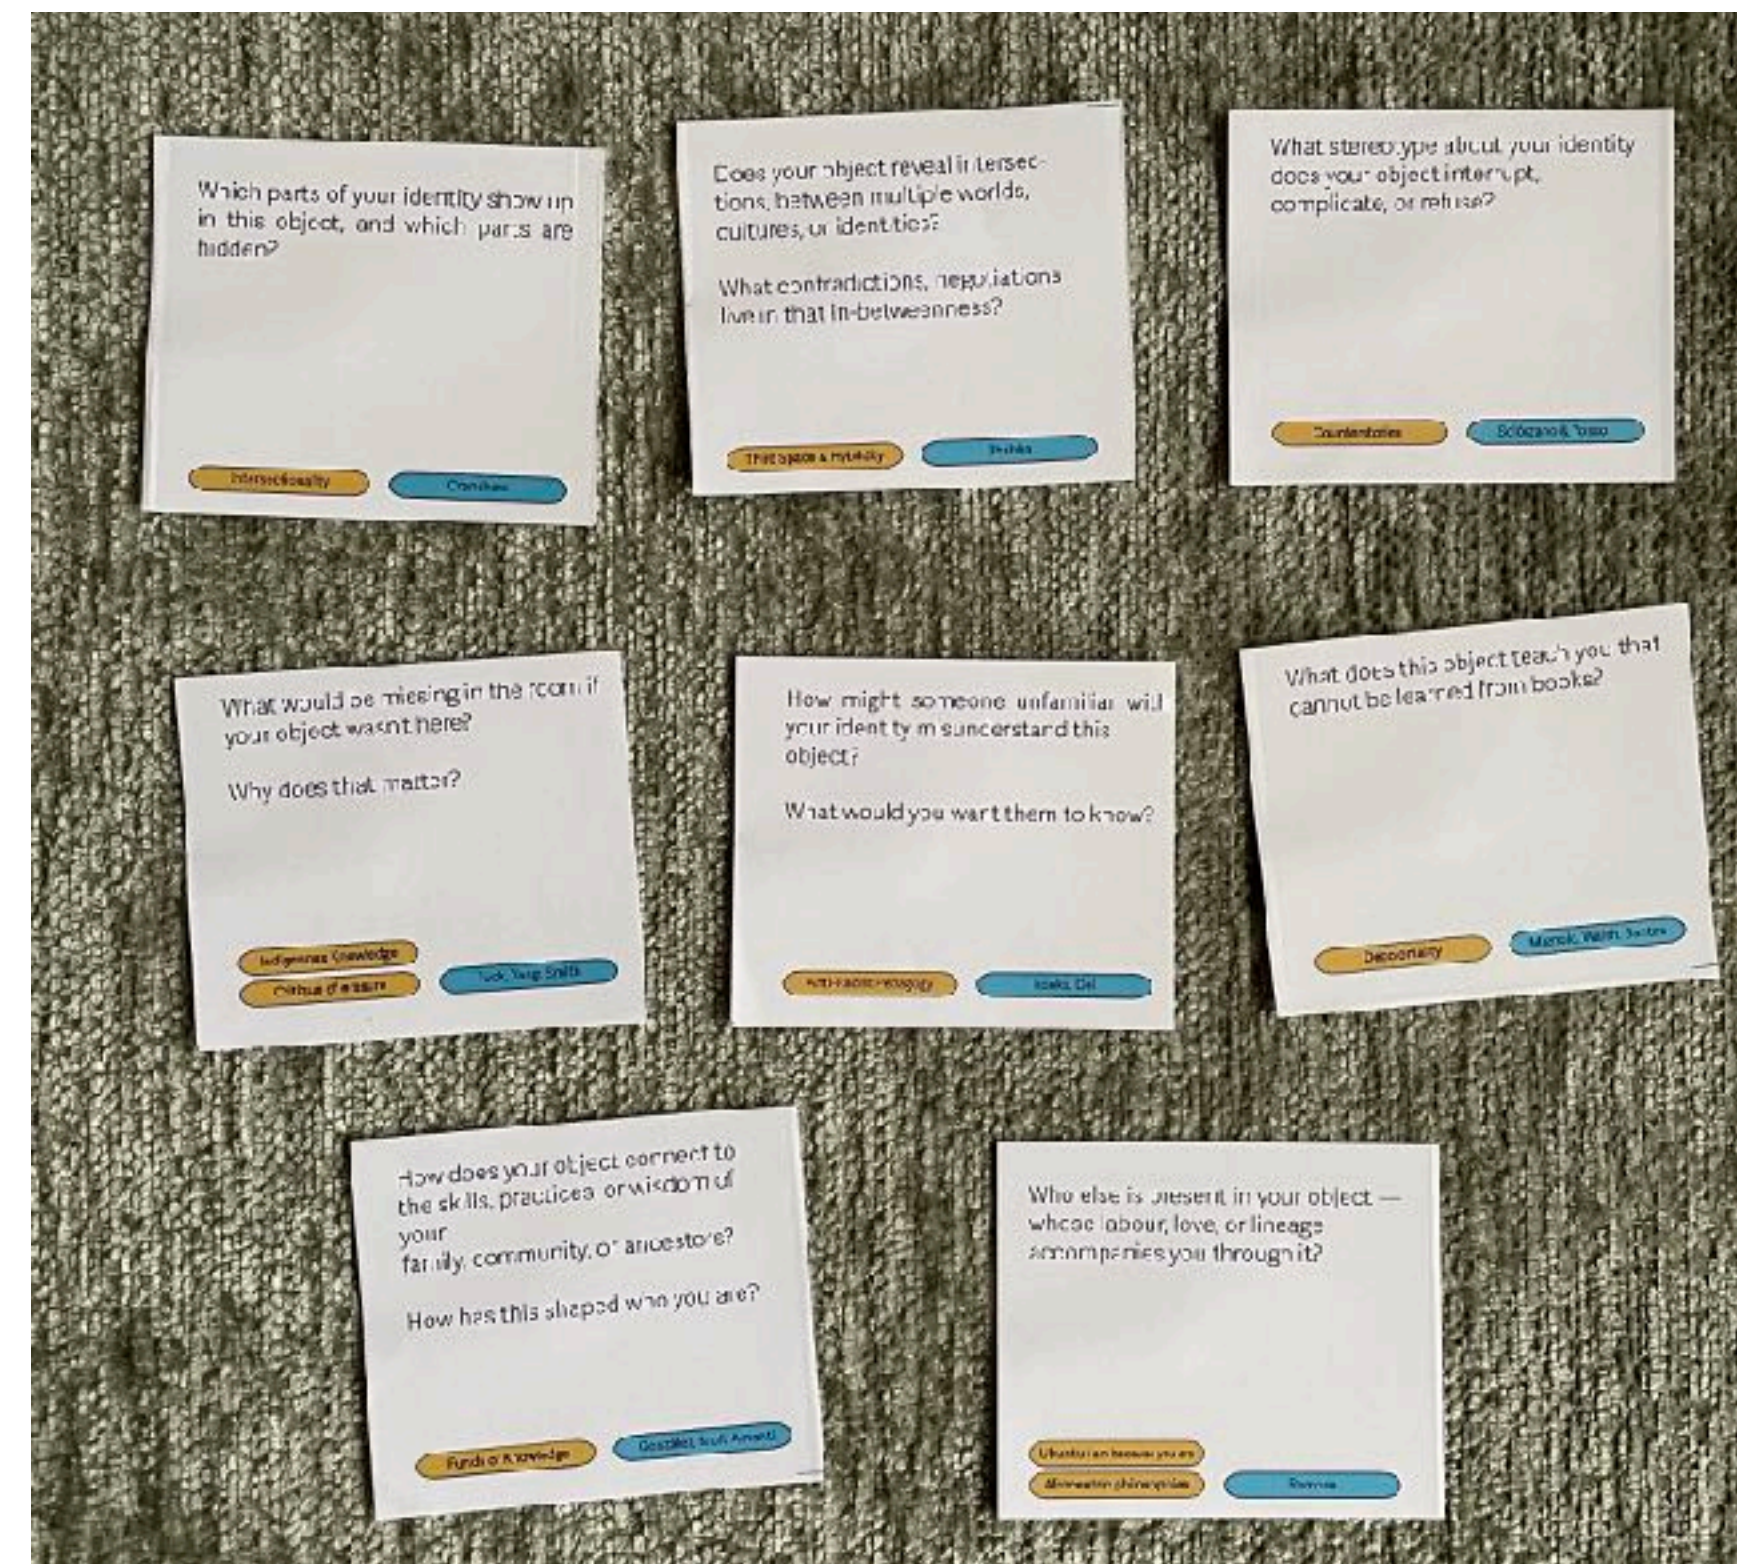

- Shared agreements, collective reading, and multilingual identity markers (e.g., three keywords in one's mother tongue) “helped situate participants before engaging in complex conversations.”

**Quotes from participants' response questionnaire*

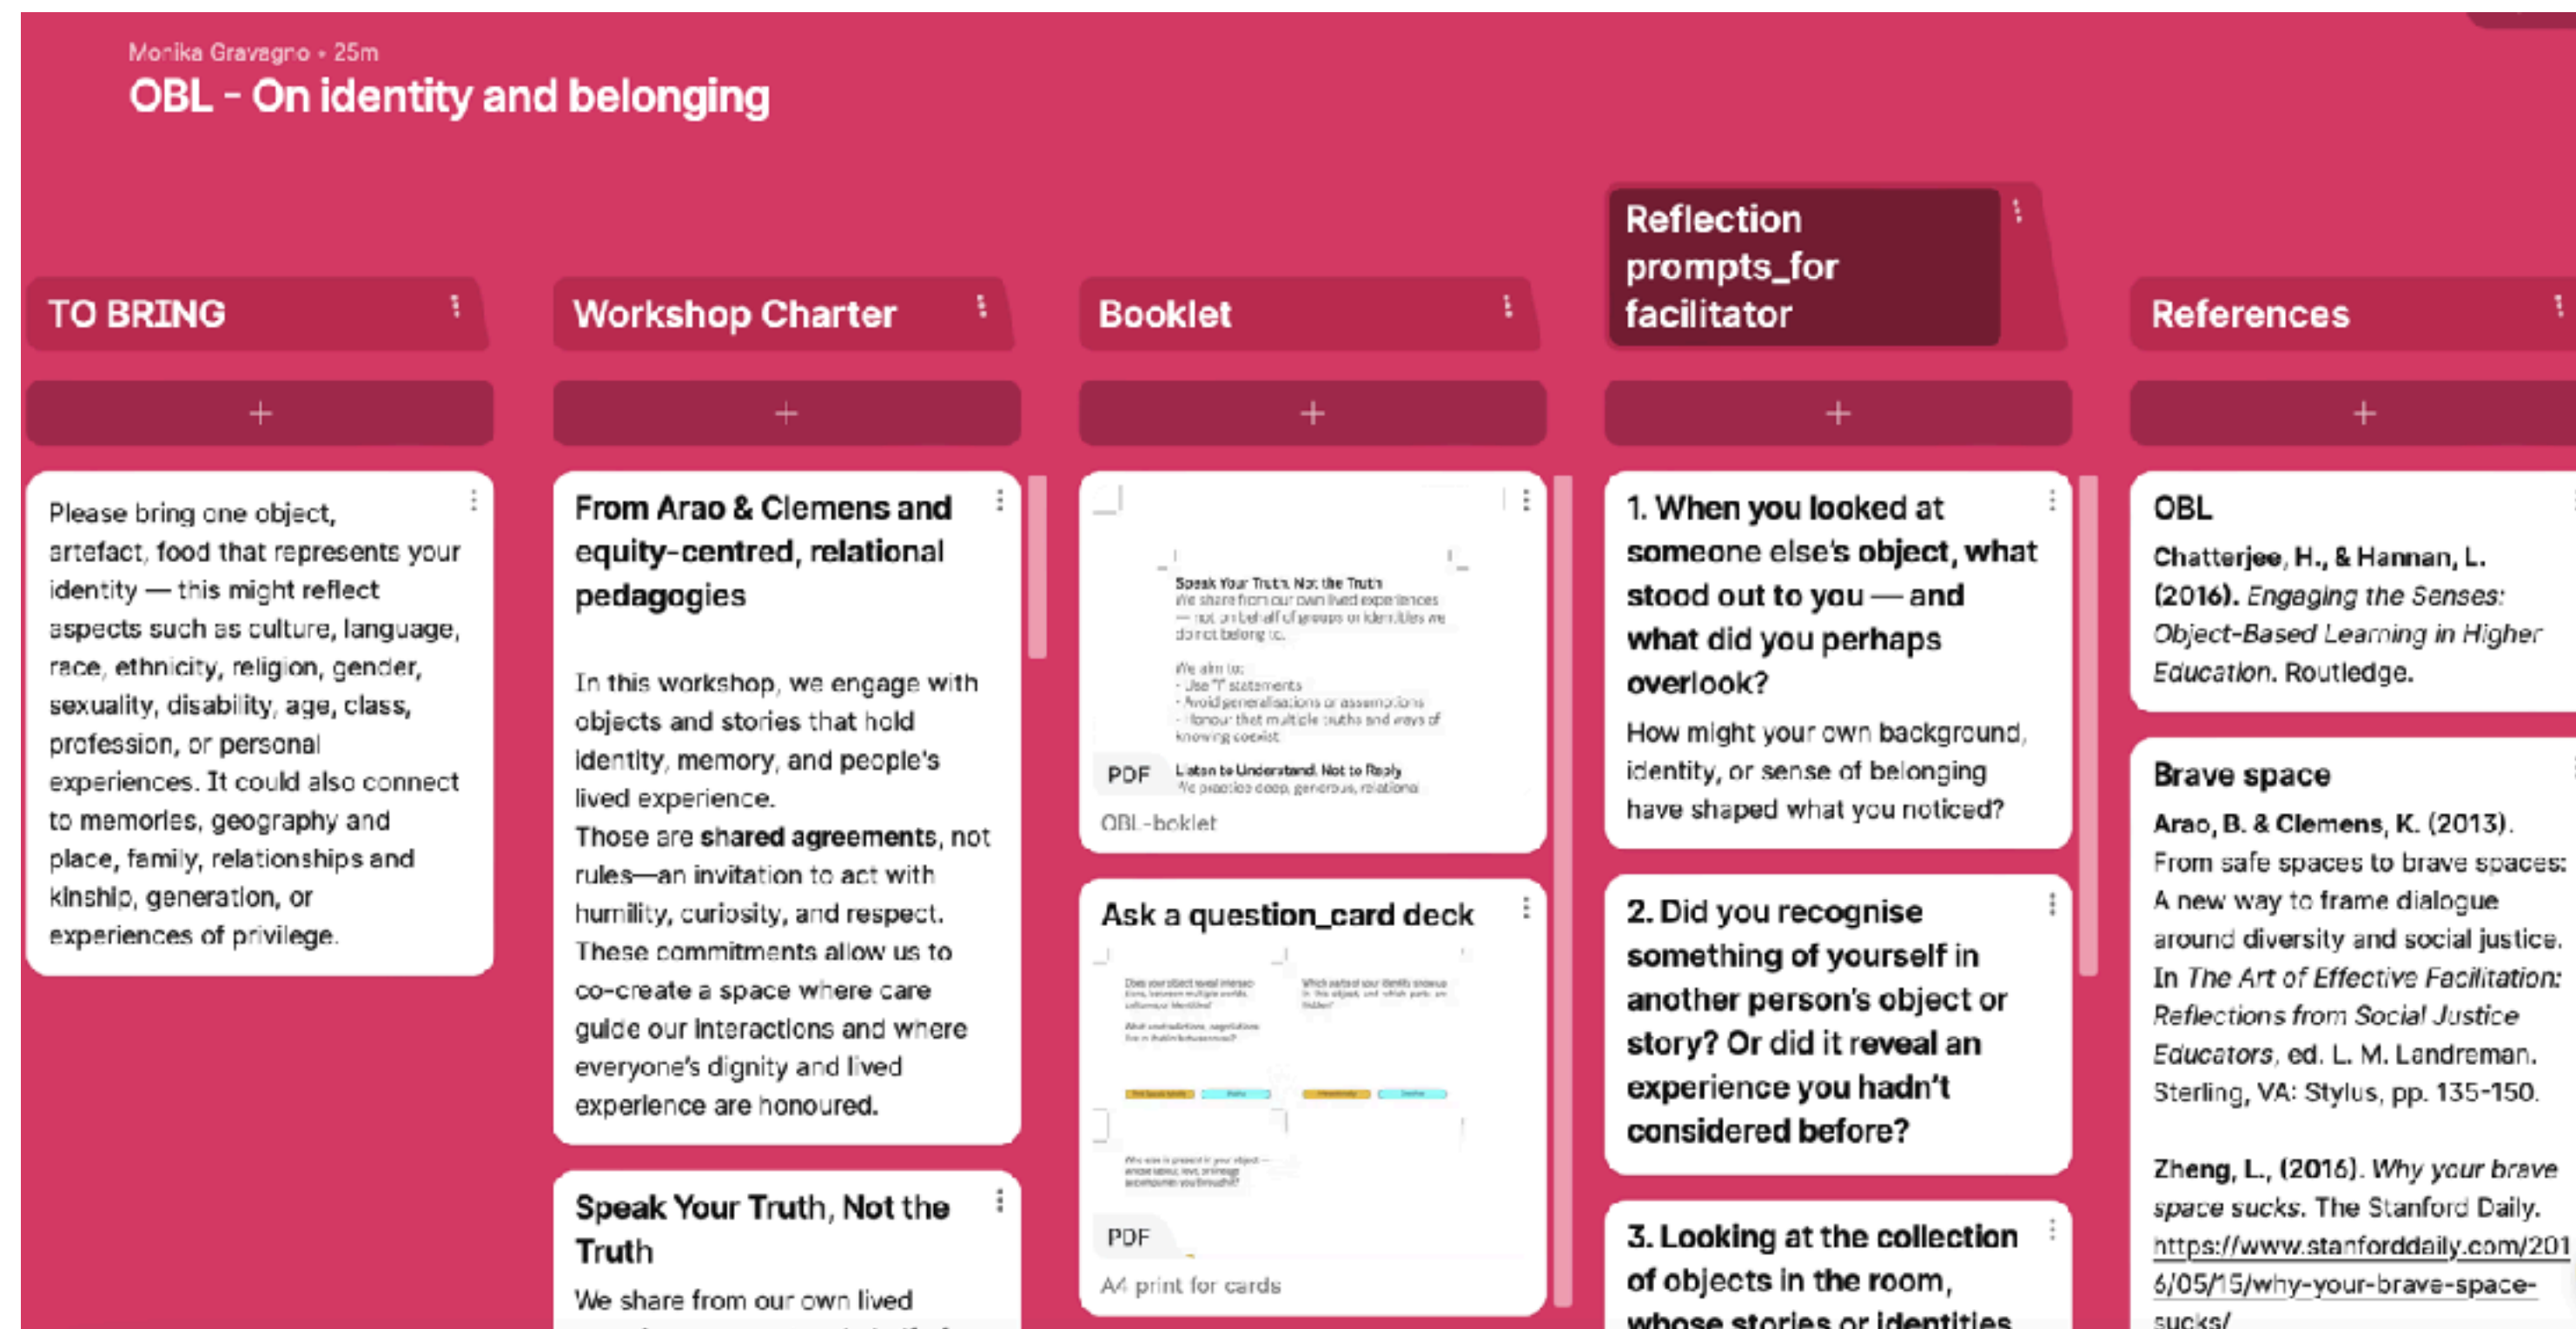

- “The questions provided really a nice framework to unsurfaced our assumptions and prejudice,” and
- “The postcard were helpful to think about personal endeavours/critical theory. How do I apply these theories to myself? (Decentering the self, hybridity, etc.).”

- “The padlet with the reading lists and related categories were helpful.”

*Quotes from participants' response questionnaire

Complexity and Listening

- “The idea of multiple truths, as well as the notion of impact and intent,” and “It was very insightful how many different aspects of identit(ies) emerged!”
- “The facilitator successfully encouraged deep, generous, relational listening... without the expectation to be verbally responsive; this was key to contemplate the physicality of the objects.”

**Quotes from participants' response questionnaire*

Application to teaching practice

- “Designing an “object CV” or portfolio documenting an object’s biography and cultural background as part of professional practices to bring it to life and render it employable”
- Applying methods within Knowledge Exchange work with communities.
- Incorporating active listening as a research and facilitation methodology.
- Reusing the questioning framework developed in the workshop: “I will try to use this way of questioning objects in my future projects.”

**Quotes from participants’ response questionnaire*

Improvements

- Clear time limits for object sharing activity.
- More time dedicated to discussing how to navigate difficult or triggering topics.
- Language in the card deck perceived as overly academic. Suggested clearer explanations or prompts on the reverse of cards.
- Reducing overlap between similar questions (e.g. Questions 3 and 4).
- Clearer communication in advance about the workshop format and expectations.
- Participants highlighted the complexities of facilitating identity-based discussions, including facilitator emotional labour. One noted that “some responses can be challenging for the facilitator (trauma triggering or feeling judged for a certain family background/privilege), and more time to discuss navigating difficult topics would be valuable.”

Next steps

Step 7: redesign/repeat the cycle

- Implement all changes.
- Scale the workshop into a CSM-wide staff development offer to build equity literacy.
- Data collection and thematic evaluation.
